FOREST PROTECTION

LAWS FORBIDDING THE DESTRUCTION OF TIMBER IN EUROPE.

Governments Have Supervision Over Private as Well as National and Communa Forests-Reforesting Carried on by Es-

In Germany the various governments own and manage, in a conservative spirit, about one-third of the forest area, and they also control the management of another sixth, which belongs to villages, cities and public institutions, in so far as these communities are obliged to employ expert foresters and must submit their working plans to the government for approval, thus preventing improvident and wasteful methods. The other half of the forest property, in the hands of private owners, is managed mostly without interference, although upon methods similar to those employed by the government, and by trained foresters, who receive their education in one of the eight higher and several lower schools of forestry which the various governments have established.

The several states differ in their laws regarding forest property. Of the private forests 70 per cent are without any control whatever, while 30 per cent are subject to supervision, so far as clearing and devastation are concerned. The tendency on the part of the gov ernment has been rather toward persuaing up or acquiring by exchange and reforesting waste lands-some 300,000 acres have been so reforested during the last 25 years—the government gives assistance to private owners in reforesting their waste land. During the last 10 years $300,000 was granted in this way. In Austria, by a law adopted in 1852, not only are the state forests-comprising less than 30 per cent of the total forest area-rationally managed, and the management of the communal forests-nearly 40 per cent-officially supervised, but private owners-holding about 32 per cent-are prevented from devastating their forest property to the detriment of adjoiners.
